

Excerpt from Egypt in 1855 and 1856, Vol. 2: Tunis in 1857 and 1858 It was fortunate for us that we had got out of Nubia, for adverse winds again beset us, and had we remained above the Cataracts we should have fallen victims to despondency, and perhaps, as men do in desperate circumstances, contracted imprudent matrimonial alliances, built ourselves palm huts, and allowed the Flea to rot upon the bank. For the next two days we hardly made any way, and our only occupation was sending one sailor to hunt another sailor, as all the wives, brothers, sisters, and relatives to the ninth degree, with which the neighbouring villages teemed, took advantage of our detention, and claimed the company of our crew to solemn leave-takings. On the first evening we had a visit, which, as illustrating a very affectionate trait in these poor people, I cannot help mentioning.
