

Do you enjoy a good Historical Romance Novel? Then you will absolutely ADORE this historical romance short story! This will tear at your heart and make you feel hot inside all-at-the-same-time! Here is an excerpt from this Historical Romance master piece: The war was over, it was V-day—the final bullets have been shot, and they won. Max Galloway walked the streets as everyone was cheering and celebrating. An ex-soldier with no more fighting left for him to do; all there is left for him was a long night of drinking and then heâ€™ll figure where his next move is. Standing on the street corner now, looking at all the confetti, and streamers, and seeing for once in a long time that there was joy in the streets. He didnâ€™t know if he was going to making it out of the war alive; he saw better men than him die badly, and yet he made it. It was something he wanted to forget, something he needed to stop thinking about, but he needed to remember what they fought for, what they were dying for over there. For him it was hard to celebrate when there was no joy left in him, wanting to drown his sorrows, and demons away, and find that he is no different than a lot of other people out tonight. To the ones who were lost along the way, the madness had left the impression in their lives, and stole away like a sneak thief into the night. Walking into a busy pub, the Old Queen Mary, the place where he had his first drink when he was seventeen; he lied about his age, but now it didnâ€™t seem to matter. His age finally caught up to him he was a man now and the boy who went to war has long since forgotten, left on the fields of battle, each life he took, each friend he lost. Reaping season had ended and he wanted to find his way home again, it might be a lot of things that take him back, but he will find it here he knows that, it has to be here. Too many harsh memories, too much lost time, what his life would have been like if he hadnâ€™t gone to war, what the world would have been like if it didnâ€™t see another act of humanity cruelty? The many haunting questions and there is no vision for him to see a glimpse into what might have been. The world needs its time to heal and right now he needs his moment of glory; he needs to see all the positive around him, because he cannot find his way back home if there is no home to go back to.
