

Of the work of which the following is offered as a translation it may easily be said that, more than any other of the works of its author, it contains philosophic truth expressed in terms familiar to ordinary consciousness. Produced while its author was instructing beginning students in philosophy in a gymnasium, it is characterized by a form that is almost entirely without the difficult qualities of exposition universally attributed to the works of Hegel. The comparative simplicity and clearness of it as regards form render it, to a certain extent at least, a means of introduction to the more technical works of its author dealing wholly or in part with the same content or subject-matter for, notwithstanding its form, its content is largely speculative. But the work has an independent value. It may be recommended as an excellent introduction to ethical and religious philosophy in general not merely to Hegel's system. There may be said of it as a whole what Hegel's most hostile critic was constrained to say of a certain portion of it, Es ist der gediegenste Gehalt in der kömigsten Sprache (It is the most sterling matter in the purest language.) And it contains, as we shall see, some material, in subjective ethics or morality, not found in the other works of Hegel. It happens that the work, notwithstanding its sterling character, is, in certain important respects, not exactly a characteristic work of its author, and should be entitled - Recht-, Pflichten-, und Religionslehre, Part I of the Philosophie der Propädeutik. (The preceding title of the Geist, Philosophie der Rechts, Philosophie der Religion, Philosophie der Ethik (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and do not occur in the book.)
