

Here's How to Generate a Lasting Legacy by Teaching Your Family's Core Values. I bet that you remember stories from your life where the values that you live by were formed. There are stories of joy and of sorrow, of standing tall and standing your ground. There are stories about the people that taught you and shaped you. You probably recall financial lessons, lessons about work or lack of it, and lessons about strength of character and the lessons of times of weakness of character, but what most people don't have is a means to transfer those values. You can have a great set of legal and financial advisors that you work with and never create any kind of transfer plan that's focused on sharing your core values. It's not the education system's responsibility to teach your family your core values. You already know today's modern world is moving faster and is more complicated than when you were a kid. Technology is changing how our families relate, how we learn and what we learn. What we gain in confidence through technology might challenge us when creating confidence about our values. A confusing part of the values transfer process is not knowing how to pass along your family's core values to your kids and grandchildren. That's where we come in. We help people just like you leave a lasting legacy by sharing your family's core values. We can help your team understand how to strengthen the transfer process. For some, they realize that their planning has been too short sighted because it wasn't based on the core values of the family. If you are transferring your wealth without sharing how your values shaped the process, I suspect that the transition isn't going to go the way you would really prefer. That's where we can help. We can... Step 1: Identify your family core values so you're able to talk about them with clarity. Step 2: Identify ways in which your core values can be related to and understood by the kids. Step 3: Create opportunities to discuss and share your core values with your kids so the sharing of your core values becomes part of the family environment. We can help you share your full vision with your team of advisors to make a truly effective transition plan. Most people don't stop and identify the core values they want to pass along from generation to generation. They settle for a set of legal documents which takes care of your wealth but not the core of your heart. Now, you can identify and teach your kids the core values that will set them up for success for generations to come.
