

Loads of people are writing about their travel experiences. Some want to make money by having ads on their blogs. Some do affiliate marketing by selling travel-related stuff. Overall, there are some good travel media and blog websites but next to a book, they're scattered and whimsical. Most writers don't try to put everything you might need to know about a place into their blogs or websites. They write what they want. This book is an entryway to travel writers, travel writing, travel blogs, travel news, travel podcasts, travel photographers and travel videographers. It has also has lots of websites for each for these categories. I list at least 1000 travel blogs, a hundred or more travel podcast websites and places to find free travel photos and videos. If you create a blog and expect google adsense or ads from anyone to make money for you, what will happen is that you will sell your soul trying to write anything to increase website traffic or you will simply revert to posting other people's stuff up to try to get traffic so they click onto ads. The way to do it if you're really interested, is to try to create a niche that some people like that's useful. Build up a loyalty following. Sell books and other stuff like be an affiliate and sell related stuff from amazon.com and other stores that offer affiliate partnerships. You don't just have to sell your own book. Sell related books like the guy at survivalblog.com. His whole business and life is survivalism so there's a new post almost everyday. I've seen several travel blogs where they're at it all the time. They never stop posting stuff because they feel they need to do this to get website traffic even if the stuff they post is crap. Build a following by offering good material but the downside is that it never ends. You can't really take a break. People are fickle. After a week of no new posts, the move on. There are a lot of websites where they're always posting content because they have to be fresh. After awhile, it's like is this stuff any good. The people at wisebread.com seem to come up with good stuff most of the time. People like strong viewpoints. People post stuff up at digg, stumbleupon and reddit, trying to get high rankings. People post stuff up on comment boards everywhere trying to get a link to their website. It's hard work. Where do you sacrifice pure writing for trying to get visitors? Sell some stuff. Offer Webinars/Teleseminars or even a live appearance that you sell tickets for in a big city where you rent a place for a night. Do online or telephone consulting for a fee. Start at wordpress.com for free. Google's blogspot.com are paranoid. They shut you down for all kinds of so-called violations. Sign up with Technorati and Twitter. Many blogs fail. People get tired of seeing no results. It takes time. The content has to be great. People want to see pictures of stuff. Carefully introduce products. There is a website that as soon as you go on it, the top and bottom fill up with a moving line of ads. It turns people off. Create a great identity or brand like the cheapskate traveler. Say important things. You're looking to create a community of kindred spirits. Your blog will die if you don't continue to give people what they are looking for. Marketing is a drag but you have to do it. You have to have a twitter account and post stuff on it. You have to try to get others to review your blog or book. You have to try to get articles up everywhere connecting to your website. There is you and every other low-life on the internet trying to make money with blogs. They might be scumbags. You might be good. It doesn't matter. You have to get visibility. Get on buzzfeed.com. Get listed at a helpareporterout.com. Some reporter might contact you and you get publicity. Look at blog award websites and best websites places. Do what it takes to g
