

Rock of Angels Synopsis The plot begins with a gifted young girl, Ellen (Nellie Dodd) sitting upon the title "Rock of Angels" hating her fair haired, blue-eyed Aryan characteristics inherited from her father, James. After describing the Dodd homestead in Richwoods near Mountain View, Arkansas the story shifts to James' parents, German immigrants, Gunter and Elise Dodd, as they arrive in America. Then the narrative skips back and forth between James early life and his presence in Mountain View. James grew up in his Mennonite pastor father's parsonage in Mennoburg (fictional place) Pennsylvania learning the trade by which Gunter supported his family, hewing white oak lumber. When seventeen, James is conscripted to the Union Army to fight in the Civil War. His troop ship is blasted out of the Mississippi River and James and a companion barely survive arriving soaking wet in the Osceola Cherokee village of Chief Ocelot near Paragould, Arkansas. James falls in love with Ocelot's beautiful daughter Judewahnah and after a coup insurrection by a wicked brave named Rattlesnake in the village, James escapes taking the willing Indian princess with him. On their first night together, James feels it is unseemly to sleep beside the unmarried maiden; so Judewahnah suggests they marry then and there. James can think of no reason why not, so he marries himself to Judewahnah at the junction of the White and Mississippi Rivers invoking the Holy Spirit as his authority. The married couple continues up the White River eventually encountering Chief Ocelot who is searching for his daughter thinking James kidnapped her. After a tense encounter, the princess persuades her father that she has fallen in love with and married the fair-haired white man. The Chief reluctantly smokes the peace pipe with James, who chokes violently from the fumes much to the brave's amusement, and the two are married again, this time in Cherokee tradition by the Chief himself. Meanwhile, the war ends and James meets Joshua Hess a merchant on the white river. Hess, a Union Colonel, honorably discharges James from the army and guides the couple to their future home which James would name Richwoods because of the stately old growth of white oaks. James and Judith so renamed because James' German tongue cannot pronounce Judewahnah build a home and raise four daughters in Richwoods. Near James' work site is a massive limestone outcropping from which the wood craftsman has a commanding view of the verdant valley below Richwoods. He names the rock, Mountain View. William Quantrill II commands a craven band of renegades feebly emulating his famous bushwhacker father, also calling them Quantrill's Raiders. The brigands come upon James and Pastor Richard Lee building the First Baptist Church at the crossroads of Sylamore Trail and the Red Stripe so named for the buckets of blood that had been shed along its course. Unaware of their danger, Pastor Lee, James, and a boy named Russell Pritchard kneel and pray for guidance in naming their county and township. As the Raiders bear down upon the praying men, a throng of angels encamp around them, frightening the brigands away. James and Russell continue on to Hess Town and Quantrill decides James' family may be easy pickings for his treachery. As James and Russell rush home, they meet the Pastor at the crossroads with a shotgun in his hands. The three men dash up Dodd Mountain Road to Richwoods hoping to save James all female family. However, the same cadre of angels confronts the raiders this time standing with flaming swords between renegades and their quarry. The celestial army is seen only by James' daughter Nellie as she discovers her special gift. Another protagonist in the drama is Russell's father, Arkansas territory pioneer George Prichard who became James Dodd's first neighbor in Stone County. A corn farmer on Roasting Ear Creek, Pritchard is the patriarch of his clan, fathering three sons and two
